Mme. Pavlova Presents a New Ballet, "A Polish Wedding"—Other Concerts of the Day.

By Frank H. Warren.

Mme. Pavlova added a new bailey to her growing collection last evening at the Manhattan Opera House. The genesis of this novelty, "A Polish Wedding," as outlined by Ruth Dewey, the author, lies in a description of the scene that was enacted at the time of the Polish Declaration of Independence, when Deputies, with their suites, from all parts of Poland, gathered at Warsaw in their varied provincial costumes. The scene was a polychromatic Polish village, done by Drabik, the painter, and the characteristic dances of the different districts, Cracow, Warsaw, Galicia and the Carpathians, all made familiar by the war, together with folksongs and popular themes of the respective regions, constituted the ballet. But our old friend Preymayl was missing.

Mme. Pavlova was the bride, M. Pianowski the bridegroom, and the festivities attending the wedding were far from being our formal affairs. Everybody seemed to find delight in seeing somebody else married and expressed their pleasure in fifteen minutes of strenuous dancing. There were a mazurka, a wedding dance a Kujawiak, an Oberkr and a Krakowak, and they are just as difficult to do as they are to pronounce. Done continuously, and to increasing tempo, they constitute a sure weight-reducing method. The guests danced, singly, in twos, in threes, in small groups and in crowds, and every one received his or her meed of applause. There was a strong resemblance in steps and figures running through the various numbers, and much stamping of feet. The costumes were brilliant, fresh and attractive. The audience did not overlook the task of nomegaw that the bride's father rolled in. Anybody had said the word the audience would have joined the party. S. Huruk, the incomparable, maintained, however, that act is a respecter of the law and that the key was empty.

"A Polish Wedding," which will be repeated to-night, was preceded by "Amazilla" and followed by the usual advertisements.

Elsa, Maria and Greta Hilger gave their first subscription concert in the evening in Town Hall. They made a pleasing appearance. Three girls in brown were they, two were
